By George P. Radak
Before Ironman
America's super hero was a teacher from Maine named Joshua Chamberlain. His account of one of the last battles of the Civil War where he is wounded (again) is non-stop action. His heroism is of such a high caliber that he receives a standing ovation when he leaves the field...from both armies

By Mary A. Walker
I had enjoyed this man's biography so much, that I bought this book. He was the Union officer who received the surrender of Lee's army at Appomattox. The last chapter was the best for me. It was a hard read, but interesting for understanding some of the battle strategies. I plan to donate the book to our local historical society. I recommend doing a web search of him before you read, to better understand his roll in the civil war.

Good Read. To read about history in their own words is priceless and this gentleman was one of the best and a true American.

A member of the Fifth Corps recounts the dramatic final acts of the Civil War, describing Sheridan's rise, Warren's fall, and the slow, inexorable stalking of Lee's forces across the battle-scarred countryside.

"This is one of the finest accounts of a campaign penned by a Federal soldier....A stellar work of Civil War history -- a classic." -- The Civil War in Books.
About the Author
Joshua Lawrence Chamberlain (1828-1914) was awarded the Congressional Medal of Honor for his heroic actions at the battle of Gettysburg, where he commanded the 20th Maine. A professor at Bowdoin College, Chamberlain volunteered for service in the Union army in 1862 but declined the colonelcy of a regiment, "preferring to start a little lower and learn the business first." Chamberlain also took part in many other important battles, including Antietam, Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, and Petersburg, during which he received his fourth serious wound of the war. He later took part in the Appomattox Campaign, and commanded the troops that formally accepted the surrender of the Confederate army. Following his military service, he served as governor of Maine and president of Bowdoin College.
